

Contributors

Ngoc H. Bui is a third year doctoral student in the area of Social Psychology at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln. She received her Bachelor's of Arts degree in Psychology from the California State Polytechnic University-Pomona, in Pomona, California, in 1991. Currently her fields of interest are ethnic identity development in Vietnamese youth and acculturation among minorities.

Jac D. Bulk is the current chairman of the Sociology/Archaeology Department of the University of Wisconsin-La Crosse. He graduated from Cornell University (BA) and the University of Wisconsin-Madison (Ph.D.). His principle areas of research have been in the fields of criminology and also racial and ethnic minorities. His areas of teaching expertise are in research methods, marriage and family, law and society, sociological foundations, and racial and ethnic minorities. He is also an avid runner who races at all distances from one mile to the marathon, however, with a distinct preference for the 10K.

Mary E. Kelly is an assistant professor of Sociology at Central Missouri State University. She specializes in the sociology of race/ethnicity, gender, and social class. She also has interests in sociology of the family and social mobilization. She is currently working on her book manuscript titled, Born Again Lithuanians: Ethnic Pilgrimages and Conversions and the Resurgence of Lithuanian-American Ethnic Identity.

Thomas W. Sanchez is a doctoral candidate in the Department of Sociology at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln. His areas of concentration are social theory, and race and ethnicity, with a special interest in Chicano Studies. He is currently conducting dissertation research on the social construction of immigrant ethnic identity and the ways in which self identification can affect lifestyle and life chances.

Joseph Stimpfl is assistant dean of International Affairs and an assistant professor in the Department of Anthropology at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

Lynet Uttal is a sociologist in the Department of Child and Family Studies at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. She is interested in how work and family issues are affecting U.S. families in the postindustrial global economy. Her research explores the relationship between employed mothers and their childcare arrangements. Her methodological expertise is in racially comparative, empirically-based social science research using in-depth interviews. She is also interested in theories of caregiving, social meanings of care, and research about women of color.

Cia Verschelden is an associate professor of Social Work in the Department of Sociology, Anthropology, and Social Work at Kansas State University. She is currently on a two-year leave on a service assignment with the Mennonite Central Committee (a relief and development agency). She and her husband and four children are living in Little Buffalo, Alberta, Canada, with the Lubicon Cree Nation of Native Canadians. She and her husband are Community Development workers with this band of Native people who have unresolved land claims with the Canadian and Alberta governments and who are living in severe economic poverty in the forests of Northern Alberta.