

Acknowledgment

While writing this thesis, the insights and original observations of many individuals have been vital to the project. In particular, Dr. Robert Hobbs' help and direction has been of critical relevance. Throughout the research and writing processes, both during past semesters and over the summer, his diligent analysis and thought-provoking questions greatly extended the depth and scope of this thesis. Moreover, under his direction I have learned much about the dynamic field of twentieth century art as well as art historical writing. Dr. Todd Cronan's discerning criticism provoked new evaluations of the subject matter and provided a useful counterpoint to several crucial aspects of this analysis. Professor Kendall Buster's astute commentary helped to uncover new ways of looking at the type of art historical writing undertaken here and further developed the critical observation of the subject. I would also like to acknowledge the basic importance to this thesis of artist and critic Donald Judd's and art historian Mona Hadler's previous considerations of Lee Bontecou's art. Curator and art historian William C. Seitz's, poet and scholar Roger Shattuck's, and historian and theorist Reinhardt Koselleck's dynamic concepts are also of special value for this project.

My husband Tim's continuing encouragement, patience and constructive criticism throughout the last two years has been of inestimable importance. Likewise, I would like to acknowledge and thank my entire family for their unwavering support throughout my education; especially, I would like to thank my Dad for our many long-distance conversations.
